Abstract

Among the many participants in the Third International Pessoa Conference, held in Lisbon in 1985, were the poet-translator Edwin Honig, Susan Margaret Brown (a specialist on Pessoa and Whitman), and myself. Shortly after the end of the conference Honig sent me a copy of his poet-participant's considered responses to the goings-on at the conference itself and its immediate aftermath. This text, which combines verse and prose, is published here for the first time.

Resumo

De entre os vários participantes no III Congresso Internacional de Estudos Pessoanos, realizado em Lisboa, em 1985, esteve presente o poeta-tradutor Edwin Honig, Susan Margaret Brown (especialista em Pessoa e Whitman) e eu próprio. Pouco tempo depois do fim do Congresso, Honig, como poeta-participante, enviou-me uma cópia das suas ponderadas reacções aos acontecimentos do Congresso e às suas imediatas resultados imediatos. Este texto, que combina verso e prosa, é aqui publicado pela primeira vez.

The Third Congresso Internacional de Estudos Pessoanos was held in Lisbon in 1985, marking the fiftieth anniversary of Fernando Pessoa's death. Among those in attendance (including myself) were Pessoa's American translators, Edwin Honig and Susan Margaret Brown. From those meetings there emerged a "packet" of poetry by Honig that he sent me on April 21, 1986, several months after the Lisbon conference, along with his permission to publish it. He probably had in mind publication in Gávea-Brown, the Portuguese-American journal published out of the Brown University Department of Portuguese and Brazilian Studies. At that time, however, the journal was appearing irregularly, with long delays between issues, and Honig's "packet" fell between the cracks and was never published. Its appearance here is thus its first publication.

I The Night of November 30th. (Beginning the Congresso)

If there were something to show
To make these conferees original
Where would they start?
Whose stuff would they pick up on?
And for whom?

They’d praise the strange familiar country
They’d be guests and hosts of it at once
A movement would begin
They could float
They’d be in the swim

2 Next Day between Naps in the Conference Hall

In your sleep you’re never they
But they many times are you
No sooner are they conceivably yourself
Than you become conceivably another out of the 20’s

The feel of tan pongee
A smell of cinnamon and lemon
Dust motes in shafts of sunlight
Through the trees
A sudden whistle
Quick flutter of a wren
A child’s falsetto question
The measured answer scarcely heard 4  Last Day of the Congresso (in the Lecture Room)

“Women I haven’t known
Fill the universe
Dreams contain them –
Mine and yours
I can neither have your dreams nor them
Yet mine and I still fill your dreams and theirs
And you on waking have me forever”

This shows Pessoa (who is no longer)
To be more real in possession
Than those who wake thinking
They possess him
This also proves you can turn anything
Inside out
If the inside is hollow.

5  Last Night in Lisboa (December 5, 1985)

I met the poet António Ramos Rosa and his wife in a small, tight, but comfortable flat filled with books, papers, desk, typewriter—a room that also subs for a living room, and I gave him copies of the foregoing “poems,” alas!

6  Waiting at Lisbon Airport Next Morning

Suddenly a lady plumps down beside me clutching a newspaper and beautifully in Portuguese recites a news item from the paper.

There, she says, pointing to it on the page, “There’s a taxi strike in Grenoble, what shall I do?” —then adds, “I am going to Paris but the plane stops in Grenoble. Must I then take a taxi?”

She seems not to need an answer because she jumps up to accost another gentleman standing feet akimbo at the opposite pillar. But I give her a response sufficient to her situation and to my own experience in Lisbon:

“Madam, pay the piper.”
