Brown in Germany Program
Continuing to grapple with the effects of the 1989 reunification, Berlin also became one of the most attractive cities of Europe, for both people from other European countries and also other continents. It has developed into a point of interest for many international organizations, companies, artists and scientists. While experiencing steady growth of its ethnic minority population, Berlin offers an ideal venue to study the changing face of present-day Europe and globalization and a fascinating glimpse into Germany’s past, present and future.
