“... the humanities seek to include the access to human understanding as a human right.”
FROM THE DIRECTOR

For most of my ten years as Director for the Cogut Center of the Humanities, I have shared my office with a large photograph of the great contralto Marian Anderson. The image shows her in rehearsal at the Metropolitan Opera in December 1954, prior to her debut in January 1955 in the short but scaring role of the sorceress Ulrica in Giuseppe Verdi’s opera Un Ballo in Maschera [A Masked Ball]. Arms outstretched in a declarative posture apparently requested by the stage director standing adjacent to her, Anderson releases her legendary voice to the apparent awe and astonishment of the attending chorus members.

The image means the world to me, as it captures and inspires the humanities and the arts as essential modes of human, social, and political understanding. We know, as everyone at the rehearsal knew, that the moment was historic. Sixteen years after the Lincoln Memorial concert that drew 75,000 listeners and a radio audience of millions, Anderson was to become the first African American to sing an important role at Met. Music and social justice converge here with a third category: namely, education itself and the importance of access to it. In this respect the humanities seek to include the access to human understanding as a human right.

These principles’ vitality is in evidence in the Cogut Center’s daily life and this report, from our undergraduate student fellows to our senior faculty and visitors to our event audiences inside and beyond the university. Our “HMAN” and related courses show how and where the humanities live throughout the university—in their traditional departmental and disciplinary homes as well as new areas such as environmental, race, and urban studies, and the history of science. This year’s conferences, workshops, and lectures continued the Cogut Center’s investment in Medical Humanities (the Creative Medicine Lectures, expertly curated by former faculty fellow Jay Baruch), in the project “Religion and Internationalism,” and in the collaborative project (with Columbia, New York University, the New School, and the Minerva Center for the Humanities of the University of Tel Aviv) on “Political Concepts,” involving at least two annual conferences as well as an online journal.

It has been exhilarating as well as a personal pleasure to work closely this year with Amanda Anderson as she prepares to assume the Cogut Center directorship. I look forward very much to the Cogut Center’s continuing growth and diversity within the university of which I am honored to be a citizen.

“More than the luxury of time, this fellowship helped validate my work...

Being exposed to research outside my field helped me see important commonalities
in seemingly disparate types of research and approaches to problems.

It was also comforting to see how we all share in the same insecurities about how we work, regardless of the discipline.”

— Stefano Bloch

"This fellowship … gave me the time to focus on writing and the time to think through the core contributions of my work … [it] gave me many new fabulous colleagues, whose support and recommendations have furthered my work in exciting new ways and made me far more competitive on the job market."

STUDENT FEEDBACK
on 2014-15 HMAN Courses

“Wow, where to begin? This course mapped out and presented so many perspectives on one of the most important and often overlooked subjects in the human experience.”

“One of the best, if not the best, course that I have taken at Brown.
This class definitely taught me things that will stay with me and be useful in the future.”

“This course got me to better assert the limits (and maybe limitations) of my own field. It gave me a clearer sense of how I want to conduct my own research and of the method I wish to employ.”

“Interesting, engaging discussions with students from a variety of backgrounds—the way a seminar should be.”

“[The faculty fellow] just has so much knowledge in his head it’s mind-blowing. He really cared about letting the students engage and discuss without his intervention, but sometimes he just couldn’t contain himself and it made the class really fun and interesting.”

“I felt constantly engaged. I appreciated the open course design that left much of the teaching and learning up to the students themselves.”

“This was my favorite course that I’ve taken in my four years at Brown. Easily.”

“The classroom atmosphere was relaxed and light, while concurrently a place of appropriate intellectual rigor and analytical incisiveness. We need more courses like this one at Brown.”

“[The faculty fellow] has VERY high expectations for his students. But you want to meet them because he is so kind and amazing. All semester I basically just gushed over everything he said. He’s brilliant and captivating as a lecturer, but he also really knows how to validate and encourage student voices.”

“The combination of theory and practice was unlike anything I’d encountered before. I would go as far as to say that students interested in crossovers between these two domains should be required to take a course of this nature early on in their Brown experience, in which practice is carefully framed by a compelling theoretical framework. Every activity or assignment felt useful and effective; nothing felt superfluous.”
